Glynn Officials Continue to Monitor Hurricane Matthew

GLYNN COUNTY, Ga.- The Glynn County Emergency Operations Center continues to monitor the very dangerous and life threatening category two Hurricane Matthew. Areas of Glynn County are beginning to experience tropical storm force winds and will continue to increase throughout the day. Due to deteriorating conditions, persons remaining in Glynn County are urged to “shelter-in-place” for the remainder of the storm. Emergency Services have ceased until conditions improve. Record setting storm surge has been reported in the Jacksonville, FL area and similar conditions are expected along the Glynn County coastline and barrier islands.

Glynn County, City of Brunswick and Jekyll Island Authority officials are urging residents not to return to the area until re-entry has been authorized by local officials. Time is needed after the storm has passed to assess storm damage and confirm that roadways and bridges are safe to travel. Conditions in the area after the storm could include no electricity, damage to water and sewer system and impassable roadways. An update on conditions and the status of authorization for re-entry will occur at noon on Saturday, October 8, 2016.

Residents and other stakeholders are encouraged to visit www.glynncounty.org or visit the Glynn County Board of Commissioners on Facebook.
